PETER COOK

It is not generally realised today that the beautiful English countryside bordering the River Wye was once the scene of great drama.

Many years ago one of our greatest generals was an undercover agent for MI 5. He was given the code number of 000007, being given a free license to kill any gag that he didn't like. Known to the world at large as ECCLES, he appeared subsequently in the cake of the same name, terrorising the enemies of his native land.

His exploits, as you will hear, were achieved alone, unaided, and completely without a brain, for who else but Eccles could outwit a horde of Japanese soldiers and blow up a bridge with practically no arms. No mean feat, as the Orientals say.

This, then, is the epic story that you are about to hear. One word of warning—for obvious security reasons none of these men ever existed, and any resemblance to anyone either living or dead is sheer good luck.

For the best results, play this record in a circular fashion.

Recording first published 1962.
